

The Real Cost of Termite Treatment in Florida

When considering the cost of termite treatment, many people overlook the obvious. What will it cost if you do not treat your home?

In the long haul, termite damage can be more destructive and cost you more money than damage caused by hurricanes, tornados, wildfires and floods. And to make matters worse, the damage is not covered by your insurance. That's why it vital to take action soon if you see the signs of infestation.

The actual cost to treat your home for termites can vary depending on the type of construction and the severity of your infestation. On average, most termite control programs can range from one thousand to several thousand dollars.

Important factors that affect the price of a termite treatment include the square footage of your home, the layout, crawl spaces, and whether you are on a slab or basement. Not only do these things factor into the price, but they also affect the type of treatment your home will require.

First Things First

Ask questions before committing to a company or deciding the type of treatment you need for your home. We've provided a list of relevant questions to ask any termite company before they treat your residence:

- How long has the pest control company been in business?
- What level of experience do the employees have?
- Is there a guarantee for the work, and for how long?
- Will they treat your home again in 12 months as a courtesy?
- Are the technicians licensed and insured for your state?
- Do the technicians have ongoing training?
- Does the company offer a free, no-obligation estimate?
